

If You Don't Get an Offer

Estimated time needed: 2 minutes

Objective

There are times when you interview and do not receive a job offer. Don't be frustrated. Other opportunities are likely just around the corner.

After completing this reading, you will be able to identify tips and recommendations to better prepare for the next interview.

What to do when you don't get an offer

If you don't get a job offer during your interview, you should:

- Thank the interviewers for their time. Be gracious and stay connected with the employer, ask for feedback or inquire about another opportunity.
- Send a thank you email within 24 hours of the interview. Be patient. As a note, you may not receive an immediate interview offer. The interview team may want to complete all interviews before making a final hiring decision.
- Don't stop your job search and keep applying for other opportunities. There are likely thousands of open project management related positions in your area. Be patient and confident. One of those positions is likely a great fit for you.
- Accept your emotions and give yourself time to process them. Don't feel defeated. Perform a retrospective. Determine what went well. What didn't go as well as expected and make an action plan to improve. Transform the experience into a learning opportunity.
- Reflect on the interview process and review your application. Work on your interview skills. Consider what you liked about the job and contact your network for more leads.

Conclusion

It sometimes takes a number of interviews before you land the position that works for you. Enjoy the journey. Continue to learn, grow, and reflect each stop along the way. Be confident that you will find the job that is right for you in the end.
